The first of these is the fact that the majority of the population is now living in urban areas. This has led to a concentration of people in a few large cities, which has in turn led to a number of problems. One of the most serious is the problem of housing. In many of these large cities, the demand for housing far exceeds the supply, leading to a situation where many people are forced to live in slums or shanty towns. This is not only a problem for the people living in these areas, but it is also a problem for the city as a whole. The presence of these slums and shanty towns can lead to a number of social and economic problems, including crime, disease, and unemployment.

Another problem is the problem of pollution. As more and more people live in urban areas, the amount of pollution generated by these areas increases. This pollution can have a number of negative effects on the environment, including the degradation of air and water quality, the loss of biodiversity, and the contribution to global climate change. In addition, pollution can also have negative effects on the health of the people living in these areas, leading to a number of respiratory and other health problems.

Finally, there is the problem of social inequality. In many of these large cities, there is a significant gap between the rich and the poor. The rich live in large, modern houses in the suburbs, while the poor live in small, dilapidated houses in the inner city. This inequality can lead to a number of social problems, including crime, drug use, and social unrest. It can also lead to a lack of investment in the inner city, which can further exacerbate the problems of poverty and inequality.
